General Garfield, one of which was chosen upon exhibits and the same copies of the papers were taken by Gen. Bliss, but I did not know it was picked out before it resembled a letter of denial from Garfield. Mr. Mohr then said that it was because it was the nearest to it in date. I showed the Mory letter he examined it and said he did not know it was Garfield's although there was some resemblance. On examination he stated that he was assured that the original was taken from the charge to take charge of the national cemeteries; this present appointment was due to Gen. Garfield's illness and that it was a mate of his, and that he was greatly indebted to him.

Seventy reached work for the same purpose Wednesday. They numbered about thirty days' work by instalments within a few days. The sufferings of the poor men are described as having been such that they could not stay away and the contractor agreed to give them board at a stipulated price. They worked for a month, but when pay day arrived there was no money for them. After waiting only for some days they ceased working, and the money they had been promised became a charge upon the poor authorities.
